ABSTRACT

Deportation according to the dictionary is the removal from a country of an alien whose presence is unlawful or prejudicial. To some, that word just means being separated from family, friends and the place they're accustomed to living in. This has been a big issue that has been happening in the United States for several years, it causes trauma on the children that have to witness their family members go through that, it also causes separations and that can lead to both physical and psychological damages, some people are against deportation and they're others that support it. Many scholarly articles demonstrate the statistics and the data of immigrants coming into this country, and yes it's a high rate, but not all immigrants that come into this country have bad intentions, most of them just want a better future for themselves and their families. During Obama's presidency it’s said that he was one of the first presidents to deport many immigrants, he deported almost 2m immigrants for several reasons, this time around with President Trump he has also deported many immigrants but this time President Trump wants to build a wall to prevent immigrants from coming in, but will the statistic/rates of deportation go down or remain the same after the wall is built. A comparison between both presidents; Obama and Trump will be made to see the number of differences in deportations and the way the people were affected during the process, while both of these presidents ran for presidents.

INTRODUCTION

Over the previous decade, immigrant communities in the U.S. have been exposed to expanding range of systematic human rights violations for example arrests without warrants, detainment without bail, and deportation regardless of family ties. There are many factors that determine whether someone will be removed from the country or not. One of the The many issues with this situation is that it Causes trauma to the family Members and it affects them Mentally.

METHODS

1. Determine what information we needed to collect
2. Analyze the data and implement our findings
3. Documentation reviews
4. Literature search.

RESULTS

ICE under President Obama’s administration removed an average of 1.38 percent of the interior illegal immigrant population per year of his presidency
ICE under President Trump has only managed to deport an average of 0.83 percent of the illegal immigrant population each year. Family members left behind suffer multiple psychosocial consequences. Separation of a child from a parent due to deportation is associated with economic hardship, housing instability, and food insecurity.

Significance

During the process of deportation during Obama presidency there had has been an increasing number of immigrant's population being separated from their families. In different places like Dayton, Columbus, Baltimore, Louisville. Dayton 62% in 2009-2011, Columbus 27% 2009-2014, Baltimore 18% 2009, and Louisville 42% 2014. Further research has shown that children separate from their families may suffer from mental health, psychosocial, academic and experiences trauma. They are exposed to many changes and able to fight for what they believe they should have a family.

Conclusion

The effects during the during the process of deportation during Obama and Trump presidency has different numbers but same sides of young children impacted by forced of family separation due to deportation. The numbers are important which proved the amount of immigrants deported in the United States, but the numbers of families is what matters. And the question is who wants illegal immigrants out? Base on the United States history many laws were created to protect the people from the United States like “the national origins act of 1924 and “the illegal immigration reform and immigrant responsibility act of 1996.
